Capitalizing on the presidential legislative prerogatives and the government’s control of parliament, Egypt’s post-2013 ruling establishment passed new laws and legal amendments tailored to curb labor and student activism, which also targeted independent civil society organizations and human rights defenders in an effort to undermine them, if not to wipe them out completely. The result has been an intensified government repression and growing human rights violations.

Amr Hamzawy, senior research scholar at the Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law at Stanford University. Hamzawy’s interests focus on democratization processes in Egypt, tensions between freedom and repression in the Egyptian public space, political movements and civil society in Egypt, contemporary debates in Arab political thought, and human rights and governance in the Arab world.