Climate change is happening. The hard question is what, if anything, should be done about it? Some nations, businesses, and individuals are much more vulnerable to the risks posed by a changing climate than others, as are some wildlife. Should nations, states, or communities mobilize to act? If so, what should be done? What risks do they run by leading? Should we do anything at all?

James Salzman, a professor at Duke University's law school and school of environment, will lead a discussion on these pressing issues.

Additional sponsors are the Environmental Ethics Initiative at BYU, Arizona State University's Center for the Study of Institutional Diversity, and the David M. Kennedy Center for International Studies.
