Bruce Wells is an associate professor of Hebrew Bible in the Department of Theology and Religious Studies at Saint Joseph’s University in Philadelphia. Much of Wells’ work has focused on the legal texts of the Hebrew Bible and on the legal history of the broader ancient Near East. He is principal investigator (along with two other colleagues) in a project to study several hundred cuneiform tablets that contain records from legal trials that took place in southern Mesopotamia between 600 and 450 B.C.E., funded in large part by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities. Wells is the author of the Law of Testimony in the Pentateuchal Codes (Harrassowitz, 2004) and co-author with Raymond Westbrook of Everyday Law in Biblical Israel (Westminster John Knox 2009), plus over a dozen articles on related biblical and ancient Near Eastern topics. He received a PhD in Near Eastern studies from Johns Hopkins University in 2003.

Sponsored by Ancient Near Eastern Studies, the Maxwell Institute, BYU Studies, and the J. Reuben Clark Law School at BYU.
