Carrie George is a remediation and training manager at CSCC, where she has been responsible for advising and helping clients build robust responsible sourcing programs, in addition to being a vocal proponent of greater stakeholder collaboration in monitoring and remediation. Currently, George splits her time between DC and NYC, as she works with CSCC and as the administrator of the Global Monitors Institute (a professional association for establishing monitoring standards). Before joining CSCC, she worked as a research analyst at Innovest Strategic Value Advisors. She received a BA in industrial studies at BYU and an international development MPA at Cornell University. While at BYU, George participated in field studies in India and South Africa, was an Americorps volunteer, and was active in Students for International Development. During her graduate work at Cornell University, she researched for the Freedom of Association Seminar hosted by the Industrial Labor Relations School and the Perspectives on International Development and Holistic War conference hosted by the Cornell Institute for Public Affairs.
