Ask Me Anything about working in the private vs. public sector, navigating the intelligence community, and finding a career with meaningful impact.

Colby Davis got his start as a Middle East Studies/Arabic major, then working as an analyst in the intelligence community, where he was promoted four times and received awards for his analytical work. An interest in social ventures and innovation led him to Stanford Business School for an MBA—and a career involving consulting, management, and opportunities in the private sector. Students and young alumni can find out more about his thought process and how to create an international career using design thinking.
