During the First World War, there were blockades that served as walls to prevent food and other supplies from reaching civilians. After the war, there were also bridges made between peoples and cultures of international aid once the blockades were finally lifted.

Mary Cox is the William Golding Junior Research Fellow at Brasenose College, Oxford University.