Since World War II, the United States and Europe have been each other’s most important allies in promoting a shared vision of international order. But in recent years, geopolitical changes have shaken the international system, and tensions between Europe and the United States have grown. The COVID-19 pandemic has increased the strains on global order. What are the prospects now for a renewal of US-European cooperation in the face of new threats and challenges?

Anthony Dworkin is the research director and a senior policy fellow at the European Council on Foreign Relations. He leads the organization’s work in the areas of human rights, democracy, and justice.